The Young Greens support campaigns to divest funds away from police forces, border enforcement agencies, and other carceral institutions. Noting that police forces and other carceral state institutions are violent by design, and that opposition to social violence is a defining principle of Green politics, we call on our wider movement to support campaigns to oppose state violence and dismantle the institutions responsible.

The Young Greens notes:

- Opposition to systematic violence across society is a fundamental principle of Green politics;
- The Green Party has a proud history of calling for the abolition of violent state institutions including, in a 2019 Conference co-leader's speech, the Home Office;
- Police forces routinely engage in racial profiling, with black people being nine times more likely as of 2018 to be stopped and searched;
- Since 1990 significantly over 1,500 people have died in police custody, with only one police officer subsequently being convicted;
- Young people are among those most acutely affected, with young black men disproportionately subject to state violence;
- The UK government spent £18 billion on policing in 2019/20 the highest for almost a decade;
- That police are frequently responsible for the descent of peaceful demonstrations into physical confrontations, and frequently use such confrontations to discredit campaigners;
- That the persistent use of carceral approaches to social problems in other spheres directly harms young people from marginalised communities, including the use of exclusions in state schools.

The Young Greens believes:

- Violence inflicted by the state should be opposed, as a key principle of Green politics;
- Violence inflicted by the state on people should not be understood as uniquely legitimate or justified because it was performed by the state;
- Police forces and other carceral institutions are fundamentally designed to contain, suppress and even inflame the discontents caused by an unequal system, rather than address their causes;
- As the climate crisis intensifies states are increasingly turning to carceral institutions, such as militarised border control and police action, to control its discontents rather than addressing the crisis at the root;
- Funding spent on carceral approaches to containing social problems could and should be directed to services that address the causes of such problems;
- The persistent focus by politicians, media institutions, and others on carceral approaches to containing social problems distracts from the real solutions that are needed;
- Police forces in England and Wales, and around the world, are institutionally racist, perpetuating structural oppression, and leading to increased danger to the lives and wellbeing of black and minority ethnic people;
- Drawing down funding to police forces and other carceral institutions would benefit those groups, including people of colour, travellers, women, LGBTIQA+ people, and the working class, who are most acutely affected by the harms they cause.

The Young Greens resolves:

- To proactively support campaigns to draw funds away from police forces, border enforcement agencies, and other carceral institutions;
- To campaign for the reinvestment of funds into public services and communities, for purposes including but not limited to housing, employment, youth services, healthcare, and ending poverty.

C2 Delivering Justice for Students

Proposer: Jane Baston (York)

Agenda item: C Resolutions of Executive Committee Priorities

Summary

This year has seen students pushed back into high-cost campus accommodation, left with minimal financial support from the government and a lack of wellbeing support. This resolution identifies some key areas for the Young Greens to campaign on to deliver justice for students.

The Young Greens notes:

- The FE and HE sectors are experiencing a financial crisis like never before. The effects of neoliberal marketisation is causing senior managers to push financial risk off onto students and staff.
- In light of the financial crisis, and the over-reliance on tuition fees, many universities are using metrics or hidden evaluation techniques to implement large scale changes to their courses, shutting whole departments and making large numbers of staff redundant.
- Throughout the pandemic the government has offered very little support to students, insteading leaving financial and wellbeing support to the discretion of individual institutions.
- According to the NUS three in five students say that Coronavirus has had some degree of impact upon their income.¹ Students have faced increasing financial difficulties this year with around a fifth of students have fallen into rent arrears with their landlord and a similar portion have fallen behind on utility bill payments.
- Students have been increasingly isolated due to the lack of socialising which has exacerbated poor mental health and wellbeing. Universities provide inadequately funded mental health support that is often overwhelmed
- Online teaching has been something that disabled students have campaigned for in order to improve their access to their education.

The Young Greens believes:

- That due to the neoliberal model of university funding, students are being treated like cash cows, being milked through sky high rent on student accommodation and extortionate tuition fees.
- Education should be free and accessible for all.
- That campaigning for reduced tuition fees strengthens the narrative that education is a commodity that can be paid and has a monetary value.
- That metrics should not be used to determine the worth of a course or use to make decisions regarding the employment of staff.
- That universities are institutions for the public good and shouldn't be focused on creating profits that necessitates severance of staff.
- That students deserve full living grants and proper financial support that allows them to focus on their studies while living a decent standard of life.
- That many decisions taken by university senior management have been to protect the financial interest of their institutions and not the safety and wellbeing of their staff and students.

40 The Young Greens resolves:

- To campaign for the abolition of tuition fees, the introduction of living rents for all, and a write off of student debt.
- To stand in solidarity and campaign with UCU against any job cuts at universities across England and Wales.
- To stand in solidarity with student rent strikers pushing back on poor treatment of students and staff.
- To campaign with disabled students to ensure that education is accessible. That online alternatives made necessary due to the pandemic are kept and that appropriate support is put in place.
- To campaign for robust academic support and simple mitigation policies for all students.
- To campaign for universities to prioritise student wellbeing by providing comprehensive welfare support and mental health services.
- To campaign for the democratisation of universities where staff and students are properly enabled to make and enact decisions at all levels of the university.
